EXPERIMENTS IN ART AND TECHNOLOGY AND THE ART WORKERS COALITION

In 1966, engineers from Bell Telephone Laboratories and a group of avant-garde New York artists founded Experiments in Art and Technology (E.A.T.). This international organisation acted as an intermediary between industry and the cultural field to promote interdisciplinary collaborations 1, 2, 8. To this end, it produced a variety of tools (forms, punch cards, directories) to gather, analyse and disseminate information on the individuals in each of the two groups 3-7. E.A.T. chapters were established in Toronto and Montreal in the late 1960s.

During this period, artists created the Art Workers Coalition (New York, 1969), whose political perspectives provided a counterpoint to a utopia of technological emancipation. The members of this collective criticised the collusion between cultural institutions and the military-industrial complex and forged new models of social engagement. Among its numerous pressure tactics, the AWC tried to organise a public discussion forum at the Museum of Modern Art. When MoMA refused to host this opportunity for self-critique, the group held the discussion forum at the School of Visual Arts. The participants' speeches were then gathered together and distributed as a collective manifesto 9. The cover page of the document ironically evoked the effort to occupy the Museum by displaying the AWC logo on a MoMA membership card.

Founded in 1968 in London, Ontario, the Canadian Artists Representation (CAR) had espoused a similar mandate. However, its demands focused primarily on artist remuneration and recognition of intellectual property rights that did not question the ideological underpinnings of the art world.

INTERMEDIA SOCIETY

Just a few years apart, Intermedia Society (1967) and the N.E. Thing Co. collective (1969), employing the services of the same Vancouver notary, incorporated their ventures as non-profit companies. Redirecting the process through irony, N.E. Thing Co. represented a fictional, albeit legal company (see Documentary Protocols I). The Intermedia Society, however, provided actual services. In both cases, the artists involved were redefining themselves as cultural workers and information managers.

Influenced by the theories of Marshall McLuhan, Intermedia Society embarked on a media democratisation project, wherein the equipment acquired through government grants would become common property 10, 11.

Just as the data from grant applications and other transactions was filed by the machinery of government, the Society's members used the postal system to communicate informally with their peers 16-19. In the process, they established an opening between this bureaucracy and the free flow of information, as is evidenced in the Society's archival fonds (housed at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver). It includes meeting minutes, reports and other documents on the implementation of this open access to hardware and the results of decentralized exchanges.

Given the communicational dimension of the activities conducted by Intermedia Society, many individuals also accumulated documents relating to the centre in their personal archives (Michael Morris / Vincent Trasov, Victor Doray). The organisation was disbanded in 1972, but it spurred the founding of a number of other entities that went on to pursue similar mandates (Video Inn, Western Front Society).

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

In 1971, the Canadian Department of Manpower and Immigration launched the Local Initiatives program (LIP / PIL) in an attempt to reduce unemployment through job creation projects within non-profit organisations. Numerous artist-run centres took advantage of these new opportunities.

In response to certain requirements of the program, artists expanded the scope of their activity to include other professional sectors. As a result, some artists introduced information processing tools to subtly work around this administrative structure. Intermedia Society, for example, set out to map the ecosystems of Vancouver 26-28. Its members used a variety of methods derived from social sciences and urban planning to collect and analyse a wide range of data. In the same spirit, the Toronto collective General Idea produced FILE Megazine to address the lack of communication tools available to artists 38, 39.

In addition to its articles and address lists, the first issue of FILE Megazine included a blank map of Canada and the United States and invited readers to draw the border between the two countries from memory. In the next issue, the submitted entries were collectively represented on the map, along with a commentary by General Idea 40-42.

CASES NO. 5, 6, DOCUMENTS NO. 44-62

A SPACE

In 1970, a group of artists created the Nightingale Arts Council (NAC), whose mandate consisted of disseminating art practices that were still marginalised in Toronto's museums and galleries (conceptual art, experimental film, performance and video art). A Space, the Council's principal project, offered a neutral vehicle supported by its users. In much the same fashion, News, the A Space newsletter, published information provided by artists without manipulating or influencing its content 46-48. The notion of space is understood here both as a physical and discursive entity, thus paralleling conceptual art's radical approach. This strategy also sought to eliminate intermediaries (critic, curator, dealer) and their influence on how art works were received.

Upon the NAC's incorporation in 1971, its members drew up a charter that would provide them with greater flexibility as service providers 44. This allowed A Space to open both a community video production studio and a café 49-51. Like Intermedia Society, the centre initially corresponded with its peers under cover of anonymity. Subsequently, certain individuals named as board members acted as a bridge between the Council and artists seeking an exhibition venue or access to technological resources 53-62. The A Space fonds is now housed at the Art Gallery of Ontario (Toronto).

VIDEO EXCHANGE SOCIETY AND VIDÉOGRAPHE INC.

In making use of the Portapak system in the 1970s, artist collectives were quick to encourage its use among their peers. In fact, Radical Software, the magazine published by Raindance Corporation (New York), became the communication platform for activists involved in experimental video and television.

This endeavour also extended to Canada. Michael Goldberg and Image Bank created singular tools to survey an emerging community. By distributing forms, they gathered the addresses of video makers as well as a brief description of the way in which each used the technology 63-65, 74. The data collected was then compiled in the frequently updated Video Exchange Directory 66, 67, 72.

In 1973, in collaboration with Trisha Hardman, Goldberg organised the Matrix Conference in Vancouver. As an entry fee, participants had to donate a tape. This exchange method gave rise to the collection of the Video Inn / Video Satellite Exchange Society, founded the same year 68, 70, 71, 73.

In 1971, Robert Forget – a producer with the National Film Board of Canada – created Vidéographe (Montreal) with the same democratic vision 76-78. Originally an arm of the NFB, the centre was incorporated in 1973 as an independent organisation 84, 85.

Upon submission of a project, people seeking to produce documentaries and experimental video works gained access to Vidéographe's resources. Each step of the production process was covered, from the rental of the Portapak system to the broadcasting of the work in the centre's "vidéothéâtre" 80. Its premises were permanently open (24 hours a day), and its team created an ad hoc module (known as an “éditomètre”) configured to facilitate the otherwise arduous task of editing 82, 83. The video Entrée en scène, éditomètre, sélectovision (1972) presents the full slate of services offered by Vidéographe during its early years 91.

However, the centre did not limit itself to its mandate as an equipment supplier. Other communication tools helped distribute these video documents across the Quebec audiovisual landscape. Through what were known as “vidéofiches,” Quebecers living outside Montreal could receive free copies of works on record by mailing in a blank tape 89, 90. The cable network was also used as an innovative distribution channel 79, 87, 88.

Les Knock Outés (1971) 92 and États généraux de la culture au Québec (1973) 93 aptly illustrate how two groups – newspaper typographers from La Presse and artists – made use of the same technical framework to spread their activist views. The Vidéographe fonds is housed at the Cinémathèque québécoise (Montreal).

CASES NO. 10, 11, 12, DOCUMENTS NO. 94-131

VÉHICULE ART (MONTREAL) INC.

In 1972, Véhicule Art (Montréal) inc. was incorporated as a non-profit company. Its mandate, much like that of A Space, was to disseminate practices marginalised by museums and commercial galleries. Like the Toronto centre, it used a spatial metaphor (the vehicle), placing emphasis on the accessibility of its technological and human resources.

Véhicule Art's archival fonds (housed at Concordia University in Montreal) recounts the genesis of such a structure before the bureaucratization of the parallel gallery network in Canada. From its earliest years, Véhicule Art (Montréal) inc. created administrative tools adapted to a self-managed framework 102. Artists seeking an exhibition venue would fill in a form, explaining their reasons for choosing this gallery 116-123. Véhicule Art also produced questionnaires to survey the user community on its services and Montreal's cultural institutions 104-108.

In 1973, a singular event led to a convergence of the artists' role as cultural mediators and the theoretical issues surrounding conceptual art. Artist Sol LeWitt sent instructions for the production of Wall Drawing on the gallery's walls. To inaugurate its education program, Véhicule Art invited students from a number of educational institutions (high schools, universities) to produce the work in their classrooms. The differences between LeWitt's instructions and their physical manifestation became fertile ground for discussion about the transmission of a dematerialized artwork.

The exhibition file today contains tangible evidence of the initiative: LeWitt's instructions to Véhicule Art 125, notes for the preparation of student workshops 127, photos of multiple versions of the work 129-131, and a report chronicling the associated educational activities 126.

GENERAL IDEA AND WESTERN FRONT SOCIETY

In most artist-run centres and other self-run organisations, artists tended to clearly distinguish administrative tasks from their artistic practices. Still, some chose to intentionally blur the line dividing these two activities.

Created in 1969 in Toronto, the General Idea collective (AA Bronson, Felix Partz, Jorge Zontal) decided to incorporate itself under the name Art Official in the early 1970s to offer services to the community 132-158.

The existence of Art Official was initially manifested through the publication of FILE Magazine (1972). The organisation then founded Art Metropole (1974) as a repository for archives accumulated since 1969 and in order to disseminate artist publications 141-149. In both cases, the collective subtly diverted an existing framework. FILE reconfigured the graphic style of the American magazine LIFE. The letterhead and cover of the first Art Metropole catalogue recreated the architectural rendering of the façade of the artist-run centre from a 1917 municipal document (during a time when the Yonge Street building housed an art supply store) 142. General Idea and Art Metropole amassed separate archives, which are now held at the National Gallery of Canada (Ottawa).

Close collaborators of General Idea, the eight founding members of the Western Front Society in Vancouver bought a building in 1973 that became their living space and a site for interdisciplinary experiments 159-173.

Founders of the Western Front, Morris and Trasov also worked under the name Image Bank. In this capacity, they envisioned the accumulation of documents as an artistic strategy in itself (see Documentary Protocols I). The results of this project and the residual documentation relating to the daily transactions of the two artists existed alongside the archives of the Western Front Society before being entrusted to the University of British Columbia 172. The Morris / Trasov fonds itself is housed at the Morris and Helen Belkin Art Gallery (Vancouver).

CHRONOLOGICAL REFERENCES

Sony introduces its Portapak video system (portable camera and video recorder). The National Film Board of Canada acquires a number of these new audiovisual tools.

Inspired by the theories of Marshall McLuhan, a group of Vancouver artists, media theorists, scientists and architects found Intermedia Society to promote access to information technology. Important figures in the city's contemporary art scene take part in the Society's technical workshops, meetings and performance events (Werner Aellen, Iain Baxter, Michael de Courcy, Kate Craig, Arthur Erickson, Gary Lee-Nova, Glenn Lewis, Eric Metcalfe, Michael Morris, David Orcutt, Al Razutis, Jack Shadbolt, Vincent Trasov, Ed Varney, etc.). The cooperative is incorporated as a non-profit company on July 6, 1967.

Jack Chambers and Greg Curnoe found the Canadian Artists Representation (CAR) in London, Ontario. The organisation defends the status of artists as cultural workers in their dealings with such institutions as museums and commercial galleries. The CAR's demands focus primarily on the payment of artists' fees during exhibitions and the implementation of fair intellectual property policies.

The mentoring structure Experiments in Art and Technology is created in New York City in 1966 by engineers Billy Klüver and Fred Waldhauer of Bell Telephone Laboratories as well as by artists Robert Rauschenberg and Robert Whitman. E.A.T. brings together more than 300 members (engineers and artists) from North America, Europe and Asia. Dennis Young founds a Toronto chapter of E.A.T. under the administrative responsibility of the department of educational activities of the Art Gallery of Ontario, where he is curator. Michael Goldberg becomes responsible for the Montreal chapter.

L'Université libre d'art quotidien is founded in Montreal as part of a student takeover of the École des beaux-arts.

1969

A group of New York City artists founds the Art Workers Coalition. On April 10, the Coalition organises a forum at the School of Visual Arts attended by more than 300 members of the artistic community, who propose a reform of cultural institutions and denounce their collusion with the military-industrial complex.

Between March 28 and 31, The Artist and the New Technologies: A Meeting Sponsored by the Canadian Conference of the Arts, Sackville, N.B., brings together members of Intermedia Society and E.A.T. (Toronto / Montreal).

Intermedia Society opens a publishing outlet (later named Intermedia Press) and a film cooperative.

AA Bronson, Felix Partz and Jorge Zontal create General Idea in Toronto.

Michael Morris, Vincent Trasov and Gary Lee-Nova create Image Bank in Vancouver.

The collective N.E. Thing Co. (founded in 1966 by Iain and Ingrid Baxter in Vancouver) is incorporated as a non-profit company.

1970

Chris Young founds the Nightingale Arts Council in Toronto with artists Robert Bowers, Ian Carr-Harris, Stephen Cruise, John McEwen and businessman Bill Graham. In September, the Nightingale Gallery, under the directorship of Young since 1968, is renamed A Space. Later in the year, Marien Lewis joins the board.

Glenn Lewis creates the New York Corres Ponge Dance School of Vancouver, an informal collaborative channel modeled after Ray Johnson's New York Correspondance School.

E.A.T. Toronto is renamed Art Communication and Technology (A.C.T.) and subsequently Alliance of Technology and Art (A.T.A.) in 1971.

The Job Creation branch of the Canadian Manpower and Immigration Department launches the programs Young Canada Works and Local Initiatives (LIP) to reduce unemployment through job creation projects within non-profit organisations. A number of artist-run centres submit applications between 1971 and 1974.

New York dealer Seth Siegelaub and lawyer Robert Projansky draw up a contract entitled "The Artist's Reserved Rights Transfer and Sale Agreement," which stipulates that an artist must earn at least 15% of the added value of a work when it is resold.

On January 6, the Nightingale Arts Council is incorporated as a non-profit company.

Intermedia Society submits a project to the Local Initiatives Program to map out the various ecosystems of Vancouver and promote an exchange of information among diverse communities. During the same year, the A Space gallery submits a request to manage a community video studio and produce a trilingual directory (English, French and Italian) of Toronto's cultural districts.

Robert Forget proposes the establishment of a video production structure to the New Society (Société Nouvelle) committee of the National Film Board in an effort to democratise audiovisual resources and disseminate counter-information documents. Vidéographe officially opens its doors to the public on November 27.

The Metro Media video centre provides Vancouver's community groups and artist collectives with access to the Portapak system.

Creation of the Trinity Square Video cooperative in Toronto.

In collaboration with Image Bank, Michael Goldberg publishes the Video Exchange Directory (Intermedia, Vancouver, 1971) which is frequently updated.

Raindance Corporation (New York) publishes a special section in its Radical Software magazine (Vol. 1, n° 4, Summer 1971) on Canada's video collectives and centres (Vidéographe, Intermedia / Michael Goldberg, General Idea, A Space, etc.).

Rose-Marie Arbour, a professor at UQAM (Montreal), implements the Groupe de recherche en administration des arts, led by Normand Thériault.

Clive Robertson and Paul Woodrow found the W.O.R.K.S. collective in Calgary.

Vidéographe creates the éditomètre, which facilitates the editing process through the precise synchronisation of two Sony videotape recorders.

With the help of Paul Wong, A Space implements a video production laboratory (managed by Lisa Steele and Tom Sherman).

The Groupe de recherche en administration des arts publishes the first issue of the magazine Médiart.

On October 5, Véhicule Art (Montreal) is incorporated as a non-profit centre. Gary Coward, Tom Dean, Jean-Marie Delavalle, François Déry, Andrew Dutkewych, Suzy Lake, Dennis Lucas, Kelly Morgan, Gunter Nolte, Milly Ristvedt, Henry Saxe, Serge Tousignant and Bill Vazan are the founding members.

On December 18, members of General Idea incorporate themselves as a non-profit company under the name of Art Official to manage service-based projects in addition to their activities as a collective.

Through a grant from the Local Initiatives program, Art Official (General Idea) creates and publishes the first three issues of FILE Magazine. Produced by artists, the magazine offers a platform allowing the arts community to create its own communication network.

Image Bank publishes the Image Exchange Directory (Talon Books, Vancouver, 1972).

Intermedia Society is disbanded.

Michael Goldberg and Trisha Hardman organise the Matrix international video conference held in Vancouver, January 17-21.

After receiving a grant from the Local Initiatives program, Véhicule Art hires 18 people to implement the centre's educational activities and run a video production studio as well as an offset printing house.

Artists Martin Bartlett, Kate Craig, Henry Greenshow, Glenn Lewis, Eric Metcalfe, Michael Morris, Vincent Trasov and Mo Van Nostrand acquire a building that becomes both their home and the artist-run Western Front Lodge (later Western Front Society).

The Canada Council for the Arts introduces its Explorations program to support projects proposed by individual artists or artists' collectives to meet new needs and promote activities on the fringes of traditional art forms.

Michael Goldberg, Shawn Preus and Paul Wong found Video Inn / Video Satellite in Vancouver, which is incorporated as a non-profit organisation the same year.

The NFB ends its official association with Vidéographe. The centre goes on to incorporate itself as a non-profit organisation.

1974

Art Official Inc. creates Art Metropole in Toronto.

Image Bank attempts to catalogue its archival fonds, which includes hundreds of documents accumulated since 1969.

Western Front is incorporated as non-profit organisation.

General Idea and the Western Front Society organise Decca Dance: Art's Birthday in Hollywood (U.S.A.). This award winning ceremony is a pretext to bring together individuals and artist collectives that have to this point only communicated via mail using lists published in FILE Magazine and Image Bank directories.

1975

Clive Robertson, Don Mabie and Paul Woodrow create the Parachute Center for Cultural Affairs in Calgary (Alberta).

France Morin and Chantal Pontbriand publish the first issue of the magazine Parachute.

A number of artist-run centres form a legal association in order to consolidate their status as service providers and access government funding more equitably. The Association of National Non-Profit Artists Centres (ANNPAC) is incorporated in 1976.
